Every introverted leader I have worked with has said some version of the same thing.

"When I show up energetic in a meeting — when I hold the room — that does not feel like me."

Here is what I had to figure out the hard way.

Charisma is a skill. Not a personality type. A skill.

The colleague who seems effortlessly confident in every room? They have more practice reps. They did not get a different personality at birth. They got a head start.

You can close the gap. One specific behavior. Practiced in low-stakes settings. Over and over.

The feeling you are waiting for — the feeling of "this is natural now" — comes after the practice.

Not before.

[PAUSE — let that land]

Stop waiting to feel naturally charismatic. Start practicing one behavior this week.

- Delivery notes:
- Open slowly. "That does not feel like me" — let it sit before moving.
- "Charisma is a skill." — pause here. Short sentence, full stop. Let it land.
- "They got a head start." — slight lean forward, conversational, not aggressive.
- "Not before." — let this be the turn. Pause after it.
- "Start practicing one behavior this week." — direct close, not soft or inspirational.
- No script visible. Know this cold before recording.

[object Object] That feeling of "faking it" when you lead well? It is not inauthenticity. It is a skill you are still building.
