

Your manager has gone quiet.

Two months, no questions about your project. You start to wonder what that says about you.

Waiting to be noticed feels fair.

Do good work and hope someone notices. With a stretched manager, that plan keeps you invisible.

I read quiet as my work not mattering.

I went back over my last emails looking for the reason. From the manager's chair, the same quiet looks different.

The quiet is most likely arithmetic.

A manager of twelve is holding about 37 topics at once, by my count. Your work is one of them.

Put the ask on line one.

Your manager has thirty seconds. Lead with the one decision you need, then everything else.

Send a plan with a stop-by date.

"I am going to do X. Tell me by Y if you want me to stop." Their silence becomes a yes.

Give them something easy to say yes to.

What does your manager read first in your update, and is it the thing you need them to know?
