

You are running the paces.

The work gets done and the calendar is full. Nothing in the week pulls you forward.

Managers are supposed to...

Be available. Attend everything. Absorb it all. Nobody decided that.

I was doing the bare minimum.

At one point I put in three or four hours a day. From the outside, nothing looked wrong. Then I asked what I enjoyed.

It is all choice.

Others can influence your priorities. You still own how you show up and how you spend your time.

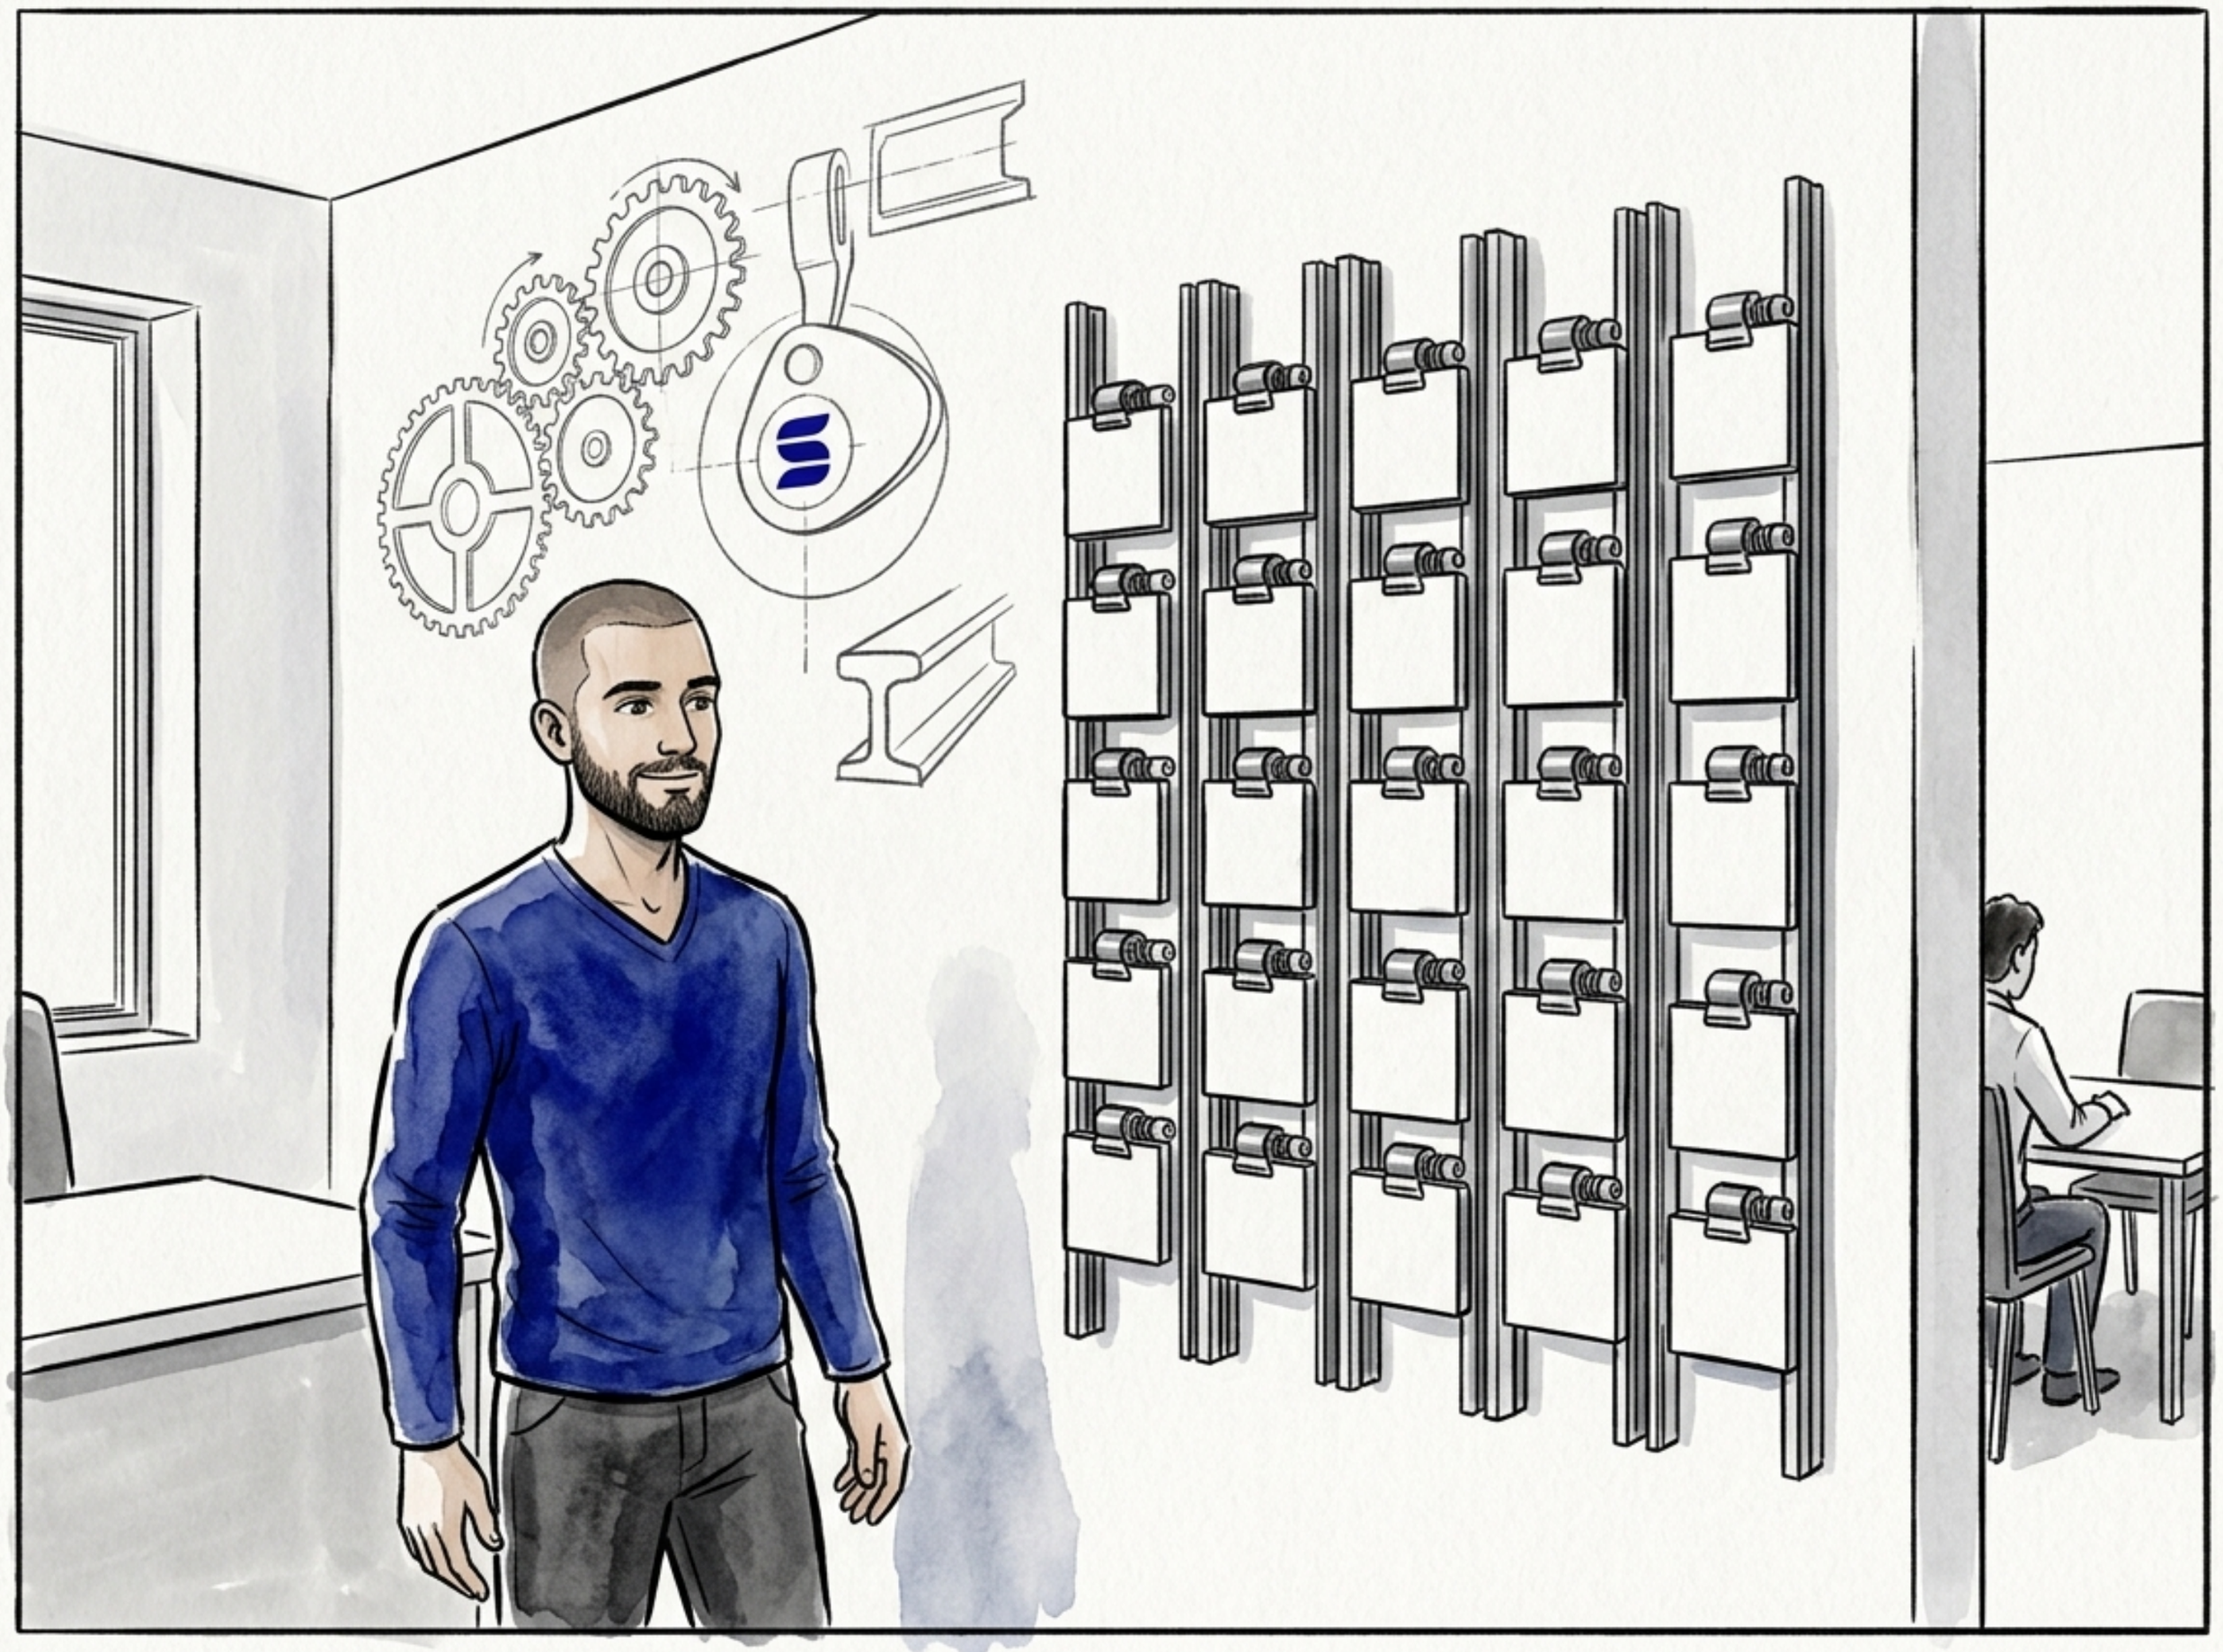

1. Choose the work. 2. Name the block.

Pick the part of the job you would miss. Block an hour for it and write the exact work on the tile.

3. Find someone outside your chain.

Decline one meeting that does not fit. Then ask someone above you, outside your chain, for thirty minutes.

Finish the sentence yourself.

What is your "managers are supposed to..." sentence, and what would change if you treated it as a choice?
